Let AI Handle It

A plain-language guide to handing off the busywork — no tech background required.

“Own your work. Own your life.”

The Busywork Trap

Somewhere between running the business and being the business, the small stuff eats your week. The same booking question. The same follow-up you keep meaning to send. The reply you've been staring at for two days.

None of it requires you specifically. It requires someone — and lately, that someone can be AI, set up once and left running, instead of you doing it by hand every single time.

This isn't about becoming a tech person. It's about handing off the parts of the day that were never actually the job.

What It Can Actually Take Off Your Plate

Answering the basics. Hours, pricing, availability — the questions that show up the same way, ten times a week. A simple assistant can field these before they ever reach your phone.

Following up. Reminders for quotes, invoices, and reviews, sent on a schedule instead of “whenever you remember.”

The first draft. A caption, an email, a reply to a review — something to edit instead of a blank page to stare at.

What It Won't Do

It won't replace the conversations that actually need you — the tricky customer, the custom quote, the relationship that's the reason people hire you over someone cheaper. Good setup routes the routine stuff away and lets the real conversations still land on you.

It also isn't “set it and forget it” forever. It needs a look every so often to make sure it still sounds like you and still says the right thing.

How to Start Small

Don't try to hand off everything at once. Pick the one thing costing you the most hours — usually it's answering the same question or chasing the same follow-up — and start there. Once that's actually working, add the next thing.

Done For You, Not DIY
